The number of endocrine cells and their secretory granules were quantified in the adrenal glands, duodenum, and yolk sacs of chick embryos from the Gestation day (Gy) 5-10 period through hatching. A great number of proendocrine cells were found from the end of the fifth week of incubation. This peak was preceded by an increase in the number of the secretory granules per endocrine cell in the adrenal gland and duodenum. The proendocrine cells of the yolk sac also showed a decrease in the number of secretory granules per cell at the end of the fifth week. The levels of secretory granules in the yolk sac cells increased at the start of the first week after hatching, whereas that of the endoderm cells in the duodenum decreased during the first week. The proendocrine cells of the endoderm in the duodenum began to detach from their parent in the sixth week of incubation, when the yolk sac cells were absorbed. The number of granules per endocrine cell in the duodenum and yolk sacs increased until the seventh week, with a decrease in the number of secretory granules per endocrine cell at the end of the second week. The present study demonstrated the temporal change in the number of endocrine cells during the prehatch period and yolk sac absorption and a possible role of the proendocrine cells in the endodermal cells of the duodenum.That was good old last winter, with all of the beer chugging going on, and of course, Christmas is well represented in beer, with all of the traditional chocolate stouts, and Porter. I saw many great events and festivals, some of which are returning in the coming year. The barley wine festival, the North Country Brewers Bash, and the Boulder Food & Wine Festival are all returning in some fashion. The Colorado Brewers Festival, which seems to be changing locations every time I check.
